Class, describe what you feel while listening to the song. Okay, you felt sad. Oftentimes feeling and attitudes toward an idea or person are expressed explicitly or directly, using language. But we know that these things can also be expressed through other means. What do you call this? You got it right. Well, we have another way, though, of expressing feelings and attitudes implicitly, and we call it an analogy. Please look at this example: Time is like a river, constantly changing yet always the same. Examine the structure of this. First, what particular subject does it talk about? Exactly. Then tell me, what two things are being compared? Is the comparison literal or figurative? That is so correct. Class, when you have a literal comparison, you can see how there is a visible, almost technical similarity. On the other hand, a figurative comparison focuses on the less obvious, and the stresses imaginative aspects of objects. Going back to the example, let us take out the phrase, constantly changing yet always the same. So what's left is Time is like a river. When we do that, it is no longer an analogy. It will be simile, right? Obviously, an analogy is a type of figurative language. But how we distinguish an analogy? You are absolutely right. In the example, there shows the logical relationship between time and change. Although analogies can be expressed in	I felt sad while listening because I was thinking of the time my father is still alive.  We call it as implicit expression.  The statement talks something about time. Time and river are being compared, and the comparison is figurative.  Like simile, an analogy uses the word like and just like metaphor. It compares two things indirectly. The only difference is that an analogy presents not two things but two sets of circumstances.
